PUBLIC TRADE SCHOOLS.
When the United States has come, as it will in a few years, to have 100,000,000 inhabitants, with a corresponding expansion of development, there is going to occur a constantly increasing scarcity of skilled workmen if the control of labor by the unions should continue. The rules of the unions in regard to apprentices virtually cut off any sufficient supply of workmen who know their trades. A writer in "Cassier's Magazine," a publication devoted to technical matters, calls attention to the approaching condition. He notes that the introduction of minute division of labor, the extreme specialization of the classes of labor, and the growth of the large shop as contrasted with the small, general shop, have greatly reduced the opportunities for acquiring the thorough knowledge of a trade. Up to recent times the skilled workers employed in American industrial establishments have been drawn, as a rule, from two sources—the small shop and the immigration from Europe. But the character of our immigration is quite as rapidly changing, so that skilled workers can no longer be supplied in such numbers from England, Germany and Sweden.
The writer mentioned sees no other remedy for the situation which is to occur in America except in training schools maintained by the States.
It is going to come to pass that not only will scholastic education as at present be furnished to each individual at the public cost, but there will be public schools for the training of skilled workers, and such a system once started may go on indefinitely. The present trend of political and social evolution is peculiar in the extreme.
